To know that someone cares, besides your family, they (donors) must have a big heart.”

— MICHELLE

Michelle, 67, lives in an apartment specifically for seniors with limited financial resources. The subsidized rent helps her manage her bills, but sometimes, her social security simply isn’t enough; she comes up short. When this happens, she looks to friends, family and the Foodbank for a little extra help.

Michelle has always been a hard worker. Cleaning fitness centers and hotels, working in restaurants and as a cashier — she did whatever she had to do as a single mother caring for two boys. She remembers visiting a food pantry when they were young and being grateful for the items she received. But her growing boys knew not to expect a big dinner each night — they just didn’t have the resources.

Now, when Michelle needs a little extra help to extend her budget, she visits food programs within the Foodbank’s network.

When asked what she would like to say to donors who support the Foodbank’s work, Michelle replied with tears in her eyes.

“It takes a special kind of person, with a whole lot of love, to be able to feel the need of someone else. I’d tell them thank you very much.”

On Michelle’s behalf, we’d like to thank you for supporting your Foodbank and our neighbors in need.
A new and exciting collaboration that launched this spring aims to serve individuals in western Medina County through the Foodbank’s new pop-up pantry. Partnering with Feeding Medina County, the Foodbank deploys its mobile food pantry to Lodi the first Thursday of each month for a drive-thru food distribution.

“Medina County is often viewed as an upper income area, but people don’t realize that we are a rural community and that pockets of poverty exist everywhere,” said Executive Director Katy Fuerst.

“Hunger tends to be hidden from view when driving through the county, but I wish people knew that poverty and food insecurity affect a lot of hardworking families here.”

As the community rebounds from the pandemic, Katy has met a lot of new individuals seeking help, many for the first time. “People feel ashamed and awkward asking for help — they’re afraid to reach out. But everyone needs help at some point. That’s why Feeding Medina County exists.”

COVID-19 has shed light onto hunger within Medina County and around the country. For individuals who have never thought they’d need to visit a pantry, they’ve realized how quickly their situation can change.

Katy reflects on a family living in an affluent neighborhood with two working adults. Because of the pandemic, a family member and their child moved in, expanding the family of five to seven. After a job loss, the family had to rely on one person’s income, driving them to visit the food pantry to make ends meet.

In addition to the pop-up program and the emergency food pantry, Feeding Medina County has a variety of programs for residents. It offers two Direct Distributions (DD) per month. DDs are an excellent way to distribute large quantities of fresh, perishable food to communities in need. The cost of all food is underwritten by the Foodbank and is quickly placed in the hands of people who need it the most.

Feeding Medina County is also committed to serving its most vulnerable populations, children and senior citizens. Each week, nearly 1,000 food bags are prepared for children to ensure they have easy-to-prepare foods over the weekend. The Staples for Seniors program delivers food boxes to more than 400 seniors each month residing in subsidized housing, many of whom are unable to leave their homes.

“Our goal is to get more food to those who need it in the county, and our partnership with the Foodbank is helping us do that. Because we’re all working together, we can have an even greater impact on Medina County. Our partnership is how we make the magic happen.”
The Foodbank unveiled its new Stark County Campus in Canton in July with a ribbon cutting ceremony and open house — a celebration of a monumental moment in the organization's history. The new facility represents the culmination of the Foodbank's five-year strategic plan to help ensure all individuals within the eight counties it serves have access to safe and nourishing food.

Foodbank Vice President Shelly Hinton gave a brief history on how the new facility stemmed from extensive research that fueled a bold dream.

“It all began with a vision. A vision for community food security and collaboration around food issues. A vision to strengthen our collective response to hunger by working together. And a vision for an investment in the well-being and enhancement of an important area along one of Canton’s key downtown corridors,” she said.

Hunger-relief partners can pick up food orders at the new facility, saving partners in our southern-most counties time, resources and wear-and-tear on their vehicles. And similar to the Main Campus in Akron, community members will have the opportunity to volunteer.

Unique to the Stark County Campus will be the wraparound services it offers the community, including a food pantry and a resource center offering support services beyond food.

“Together, we have constructed not only a purpose-built food bank in the heart of Canton where the need is great, but because of your generosity, we’ve built a facility that will offer wraparound services to benefit the entire community,” explained Shelly.

LEARN MORE WAYS YOU CAN HELP YOUR FOODBANK

The Foodbank can provide food, essential items and hope to thousands of families each year because of your generosity. As we continue to expand the programs and services we’re able to offer the community, we’re also expanding the ways in which you can engage with and support your Foodbank. Giving to the Foodbank can be done directly by:

- Remembering the Foodbank in your will with a bequest.
- Gifting cash or property and receiving fixed payments during your lifetime through a charitable gift annuity.
- Assigning an existing life insurance policy to the Foodbank.
- Selecting the Foodbank as the beneficiary of your retirement, investment or bank account.
